SYMPOSIUM

Decolonising university collections? Challenges, issues and perspectives

8 and 9 October 2026

9:00 AM > 5:00 PM

Musée L

The growing reflection on colonial legacies within European universities has led to the publication of reports and the creation of working groups highlighting universities' historical involvement in colonialism. These initiatives are part of a broader movement, with European and international efforts aiming at decolonising collections, curricula, and academic structures. However, from the risk of political appropriation, marketing strategies, to the reproduction of colonial scientific approaches, the decolonisation of university museums raises profound questions.

Two key issues can be pointed out:

- Decolonising university collections: examining their provenance, management, and the relationship to knowledge production through critical research and collaboration with the communities concerned.
- Rethinking relationships with the colonial legacies: beyond collections themselves, questioning curricula, power dynamics, and collaborations with universities in former colonies in order to foster more balanced partnerships.

These multidisciplinary reflections also extend to new forms of colonisation and call for a broader reassessment of academic practices. How can these initiatives bring about lasting transformation within university institutions?
